POETRY.

Are few, but deep and solemn, and they break Fresh from the fount of feeling.—Percival.

From the U. S. Gazette.

LINES IN MEMORY OF
RICHARD M. HUMES, ESQ.

Thou art gone from our sight! yet fond Memory keeping Her virgils of tears, bids us mourn for thee yet,
And long shall the grave where the loved one is sleeping
Be hallow'd by hearts that can never forget.

We weep not the blest; yet the warm tear is starting
To think upon all that thy loved ones have lost—
The anguish untold of their last bitter parting—
Their love early blighted—their hopes early crossed.

And thy memory oft to our sad hearts appealing,
Wakes the sigh of regret 'mid the still faithful few Who long shall remember thy heart's genial feeling, Thy kindness so warm, and thy friendship so true.

The spring is around us, with sunshine and flowers,
But how can we joy in their beauty or bloom; They breathe of thy love, in the bright bygone hours, As in sadness we weave them, a wreath for thy tomb.

We look on the stars, as high burning above us—
In glory they shine, in their region of light, And fancy a voice from the lost ones, who love us, Speaks peace to our tears, on the stillness of night.

It tells of the fleetness of time and sorrow—Though dark be our doom, it shall quickly be o'er,
When the dawn shall arise of that heavenly morning
In whose light we shall meet to be severed no more.

Now far from earth's shadows we trust thou art dwelling, Where no grief and no change shall come o'er thy rest, Where the songs of the angels are raptuously swelling,
And bliss unalloyed, gilds the bowers of the blest.

THEODOSIA.

this is but half the work. Let them be made victuous and religious, or you leave them more exposed to danger than they were before."

MARY AND ELIZABETH.

OR

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN.

A TALE FOR THE LADIES.

BY J. M. WILLIS, GEIST.

Concluded.

Nothing more was said on the subject until a popular temperance advocate lectured in the town in which he resided. Mary was anxious to attend, and of course James offered to accompany her. Every one who knew them expected that James would enrol himself under the secure folds of the teetotal banner. Many knew the sovereign influence Mary possessed over her admirer, and they expected that she would surely exercise it in a matter that so directly affected her happiness.

The evening of the lecture arrived—the hall was crowded with ladies and gentlemen, and the lecturer portrayed in eloquent tones and vivid colors the evils of moderate drinking and the temptations that were thrown in the way of young men by this fashionable abomination.

Many signed the pledge, and James was urged to do so; an intimate and confidential friend of his urged him to do so on Mary's account; but he replied that she must lead the way, and if she then requested it he would willingly do so; but Mary urged that she did not drink—that she was even never tempted—as for James she had full confidence in his ability to govern himself. That night they left the meeting without the solemn and beautiful obligation of total abstinence.

In three weeks from that evening they were united in wedlock. Never was there a happier bride than was Mary Willis. She seemed to revel in the luxury of her husband's love, and delighted in little else than his presence and the fond assurance of his affection.

For two years there was little interruption to their happiness, James, it is true, still continued a moderate drinker, but as he was not known to stagger under the effects of intoxication, Mary felt no apprehension as to his safety. But at a time when the swelling tide of their prosperity seemed to be at its height, James was met by a sudden reverse of fortune which bore heavily on his mind—for he feared that his dear Mary could not endure the mortification consequent on descending from a sphere of ease and elegance to one of a humble cast. But ah! how imperfectly did he understand the devotedness and the firmness of woman's love!
If, instead of fearing to shock the feelings of woman, man would only confide all his cares and sorrows in her whom he knows by the endearing name of wife—tell her all in adversity as well as prosperity—she would only love him more devotedly, and console him in the hour of trial.

But James feared to do so; and in order to drown his cares and alleviate (?) his mental suffering, he now increases the frequency of his potations at the wine cup!
He became melancholy, and at times morose; he was seldom at home, and when there he seemed no longer to delight in the fond endearments of his affectionate wife or the sweet music of his innocent prattling babe!
Mary saw her error—now she pleaded coax-ed, implored with tearful eyes, but, alas! it now seemed too late. The demon of the wine cup had fastened upon his soul—a burning thirst craved incessantly which he in vain tried to quench by habitual draughts of liquid poison. Poor man! where is thy boasted moral firmness? where has thy late decision of character fled to? where now is thy capability of governing thyself? All, all gone—swallowed up in the insatiable gulf-stream of intemperance! Where now is the influence of the Mary? Ah the influence of burning thirst has overcome that hitherto talismanic power! Her tearful entreaties move him to the utmost recesses of his calloused soul, while in her presence; but when the tempter again appeared before him, all moral resolution vanished.

James Willis has fallen—he is undone!
Another period of two long weary years passed by, and Mary still hoped on with woman's untiring fortitude against the swelling tides of adversity. Hoped? Ah, how vain?

James is now a miserable drunkard, a grog-shop renegade, and a staggering street loafer. Poor Mary sustains herself under her afflicted trials with christian resignation.
By the dim light of the midnight oil she assiduously plies her needle to gain a mea-gruitance to sustain her dear children, her only remaining earthly solace, and her poor degraded husband, whom she stills loves with all a woman's fond devotedness!
She is now sorry that she did not exercise the influence she possessed over James when he was a temperate young man, suing for heart and hand. Like many others, she regretted her erring course when it was too late to make amends for the past.

Reader, allow me to take you back, in imagination, to the evening of the 23d of December, 1844, in the well known town of L—. Come with me to that small tenement in River alley—Look in that dreary apartment. That wan and weary stricken countenance upon which we can still trace the faded lines of Mary! That sweet little boy and girl who are looking up in her face with tearful eyes are her children—the offspring of one to whom she gave her full heart's affection in her early days of happiness and prosperity.

In little Alfred you can trace the perfect embryo of his father's manly form and fair features, before they were obliterated by the demon Intemperance. Little Emma is a fac simile of her mother's loveliness—but oh! may she never suffer the pangs of agony and misery that her mother has endured.

Look! behold the form of a man rises from an humble mattress in the corner of the room, he gazes around with a wild and vacant stare, and springing to the floor utters a dreadful yell, followed by a deep sepulchral groan. That is the emaciated form of the once high-minded James Willis, now raving in all the horrors of delirium Tremens!—The wife of his bosom flies from him as from a walking pestilence, and her children cling in fear to her trembling knees. Three men rush in from an adjoining room, seize the maniac and bear him forcibly to the mattress where they had left him a short time, apparently in a state of repose. He raves like a bedlamite, and the men are obliged to hold him down by main force. See his desperate struggles—hear his fearful shrieks! Now he fancies he sees a huge anaconda about to fasten his serpentine coils around him—

"The monster—the monster! let me go—see! see! it is upon me—there! there! don't you his fiery fangs—his glaring eyeballs are fixed upon me—O, God! he is crushing me—help! help! help!" and the poor man shrinks under the cover exhausted, fancying that he is about to be eaten up alive. Oh! who can imagine the horrors of the drunkard's disease.—
